Architect's vision

Qubed Nathiagali is a hospitality project nestled in the mountains. The notion was to explore container housing in a hospitality typology. Foremost, the single unit was designed and then multiple units were stacked through a very metabolist approach. The articulation of units has an organic biological modular growth.

Every unit is mobile and independent in terms of function and form. Qubed had a complex brief with private rooms, commercial space, administrative front and services overlapping on a smaller footprint. The round-shaped puncture frames the view and lit up the room. The glass-covered corridor covers the building from the roadside.

The existing structure is incorporated into the services block and the rest of the functions are superimposed in the container form. The independent metal structure grid is providing a support framework for the units. Authentic textures of items are exploited to retain their true essence. The choice of materials was dictated by the archetype. The design process has been quite additive throughout the journey of the project, starting from a 3-container cluster and evolving in to a 13-containers complex.
